This was the year in which the Chinese economy sought to achieve a breakthrough amid the complicated global situation. The sudden Brexit; the worsening European refugee crisis; the dramatic U.S. presidential election; and the Fed's firm stance on raising interest rates have all made the game even trickier for China as an international player. On the other hand, China is also facing serious domestic issues as the nation enters a transitional period in its economic development, with supply-side structural reform beginning to make a real impact. In addition, it appears even more likely that personnel adjustments at the higher levels will be clarified during the 6th Plenary Session.

As we head into the final months of the year, it's the perfect time to reflect on what has happened in 2016 and what 2017 might bring.

To address this problem, Tsinghua University Center for China in the World Economy (CCWE) invites the brightest global scholars, governors and executives from research institutions, businesses and international organizations to participate in our forum which will be held on Oct 29th(Saturday) from 2pm to 5pm at Weilun Auditorium. Experts will discuss breaking news, analyze major issues, and propose corresponding strategies while providing policy suggestions.
